Our jobs affect everything in our lives, from our finances to our daily routines. Trade unions make our working lives better by advocating for good conditions, benefits, and fair pay.

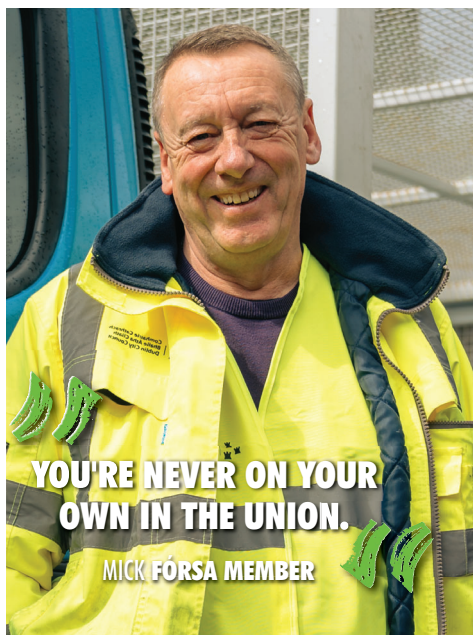

Union membership is about more than individual benefits. When your workplace is part of a trade union, you and your colleagues have a stronger position in negotiating with your employer on things like working hours, pay, and conditions. This is called collective bargaining, and it gives you more power and security than negotiating on your own.

In fact, union members tend to earn more and enjoy better working conditions than non-members.

And if you ever have an issue at work, your union will have your back.

If you're thinking union membership might be for you, talk to your colleagues – and they can tell you how the union makes things better in your workplace.

OWN IN THE UNION.
